

A vibrant, stylized illustration representing climate justice. It features a large globe on the left, a central sun, a solar panel, a person on a bicycle, a bee, a butterfly, a wind turbine, and two women carrying a large green arrow. The background is composed of various geometric shapes in shades of blue, green, and red.

What is climate justice and why is it important?

Climate justice issue

The power imbalance at the root of COP26's failures could be seen in the mundane practicalities of attending the conference itself. Many delegates from the countries most vulnerable to the climate crisis were not even present at the conference. Small island states stressed that without vaccination, their delegations could not attend. Whilst those on the frontlines of the crisis were excluded, at least 503 fossil fuel lobbyists for some of the world's biggest polluting oil and gas giants were granted access to the negotiations.

- Global South negotiators, such as Bolivia's chief negotiator, Diego Pacheco Balanz, asserted that this net-zero proposal was a false solution to enable a "great escape" from wealthier countries' responsibilities to actually reduce carbon emissions. Some climate justice activists also fiercely resisted the proposal, arguing that the 'net' in 'net zero' delays and deflects from cutting carbon emissions at source while allowing business as usual to flourish through fossil fuels and industrial agriculture. They have also claimed that it could lead to land grabs that dispossess farmers, rural and indigenous communities.
